Spring has sprung. Flowers are blooming, bees are buzzing, and everyone wants to pack winter away. But spring brings more than sunshiny days and longer evenings; it also brings turbulent weather that can wreck your nerves, your property and your home. Learn how to prepare your home and yourself for severe spring weather so you can enjoy the good times ahead.

Types of Severe Spring Weather

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) recognizes several types of severe spring weather. The most widespread include:

- Thunderstorms
- Tornadoes
- Flooding
- Lightning

Knowing what type of severe weather your area can expect is the first step in preparing. If you're in the market for a new home, ask your REALTOR® what kind of weather the area experiences. If you're completely new to the area, the National Weather Service offers resources based on location.

Watch or Warning: What's the Difference?

When bad weather is approaching, you can stay ahead of it by knowing what these meteorological terms mean:

- Advisory: Be aware that bad weather is likely to occur based on current weather conditions.
- Watch: Be prepared for bad weather to happen, because conditions are occurring that make the chances even more likely than those of an advisory.
- Warning: Severe weather is imminent or already occurring. Take whatever precautions the specific weather warrants.
